MISS HELEN BROOKE HERFORD.

By reason of the lateness of the time Miss Herford was only a few minutes in which to speak. She gave a brief account of the women of the Unitarian and other Liberal Christian churches were banded together into what is known as the National Women's League. She explained that in every church there was some sort of women's society. That these societies had in the past known very little of each other, and that in America the women banded together under the organization had been productive of increased power and effectiveness and had had a marked influence on American Unitarianism. Two or three years ago, said Miss Herford, the English Unitarian women united and had formed the "Women's League". This League now has almost fifty branches and its object is to maintain a sense of fellowship among the women, of the churches, to render their work more effective, and to deepen their religious life. Miss Herford gave the greetings of the women of the League to the women of the progressive religious thought in Germany, and she suggested that the time had come when an International Society might be formed and the German women join hands with their English and Hungarian sisters.
